

The conference “The Thrill of the Still - Analyzing Global Processes between Immobility and Mobility” focuses on the interrelationship between effects of mobility and immobility. Prof. John Urry (Lancaster) will discuss key concepts of the conference in his keynote address titled „Would Standing Still Save the Planet?“ on Thursday, June 12th, 2008.

Mobility is one of the key terms for describing and explicating globalization – global processes would not even be conceivable without movement and mobility. Networking, consolidation, transfer, and transformation unfold as the specific characteristics of a permanently changing, globalizing world – the faster and the more dynamic the better. Acceleration, i.e. increasing rates of mobility, therefore often appears as its motto. Immobility is always conceptualized along with Mobility as a constitutive albeit usually diametrically opposed element of global developments, but it is rarely reflected upon as such.

Depending on the context, both categories carry positive as well as negative connotations. When and in which contexts does mobility connote movement, transformation, and change, and when does it connote anchor- and defenselessness? And what epistemic benefits can be gained from the observation of the two categories’ interdependence?

The contributions to this conference provide a broad framework within which these and further questions will be discussed with respect to the current and future examination of globalization from a cultural studies perspective. The Conference will be held in English. Please visit http://www.phil.uni-mannheim.de/pk\_globalisierung/ for further information.
